Statement of Objects and Reasons

In the late nineties, the power sector was unbundled and Water and Power Development Authority's distribution function was segregated and transferred to eight corporate entities exclusively licensed in the distribution business with the newly formed National Electric Power Regulatory Authority (NEPRA). The 2002 Power Policy was introduced to facilitate and encourage private sector participation in the sector. It was expected that under the supervision of NEPRA, the power sector would be radically turned around and the public footprint would be gradually reduced in the wake of competitive tariff structures.

2. However, the expected outcomes were not successfully met. In part this was because of a regulatory framework which did not adequately cater for moving to competitive and therefore efficient power sector transactions. The framework also placed excessive focus on tariff setting by the regulator. Over time, this resulted in an illiquid power sector with persisting system inefficiencies. A strategy was therefore needed to take the unbundling plan to its next logical phase, i.e. the establishment of a power market and introduction of proportionate regulatory models.

3. Consequently, in 2013, the Council of Common Interests (CCI) approved the National Power Policy of 2013, laying down key components of a development strategy for achieving an efficient, competitive and sustainable power sector in Pakistan. The Policy not only affirmed the resolve of the Federal Government to "...limit its role to policy making" and to ensure that "unless necessary, service delivery will be promoted through a fiercely competitive and transparent private sector", it also approved the strengthening of NEPRA as "a world class regulatory authority with sophisticated and efficient capacity to establish tariffs and set the foundation for a competitive bidding process".

4. In light of the decision of the CCI, the Bill has been designed to achieve the aforesaid objectives. A matrix containing the redline version of the amendments is enclosed at Annex A for ready reference.

Statement of Objects and Reasons

In the late nineties, the power sector was unbundled and Water and Power Development Authority's distribution function was segregated and transferred to eight corporate entities exclusively licensed in the distribution business with the newly formed National Electric Power Regulatory Authority (NEPRA). The 2002 Power Policy was introduced to facilitate and encourage private sector participation in the sector. It was expected that under the supervision of NEPRA, the power sector would be radically turned around and the public footprint would be gradually reduced in the wake of competitive tariff structures.

2. However, the expected outcomes were not successfully met. In part this was because of a regulatory framework which did not adequately cater for moving to competitive and therefore efficient power sector transactions. The framework also placed excessive focus on tariff setting by the regular. Over time, this resulted in an illiquid power sector with persisting system inefficiencies. A strategy was therefore needed to take the unbundling plan to its next logical phase, i.e. the establishment of a power market and introduction of proportionate regulatory models.

3. Consequently, in 2013, the Council of Common Interests (CCI) approved the National Power Policy of 2013, laying down key components of a development strategy for achieving an efficient, competitive and sustainable power sector in Pakistan. The Policy not only affirmed the resolve of the Federal Government to "...limit its role to policy making" and to ensure that "unless necessary, service delivery will be promoted through a fiercely competitive and transparent private sector", it also approved the strengthening of NEPRA as "a world class regulatory authority with sophisticated and efficient capacity to establish tariffs and set the foundation for a competitive bidding process".

4. In light of the decision of the CCI, the Bill has been designed to achieve the aforesaid objectives. A matrix containing the redline version of the amendments is enclosed at Annex A for ready reference.
